Walking with My Delaware Grandfather

BY DENISE LOW

Walking home I feel a presence following and realize he is always there that Native man with coal-black-hair who is my grandfather. In my first memories

he is present, mostly wordless,
   resident in the house where I was born.

My mother shows him the cleft in my chin identical to his. I am swaddled and blinking in the kitchen light. So we are introduced. We never part.

Sometimes I forget he lodges in my house still
   the bone-house where my heart beats.

I carry his mother’s framework
   a sturdy structure. I learn his birthright.

I hear his mother’s teachings through
   what my mother said of her:

She kept a pot of stew on the stove
   all day for anyone to eat.

She never went to church but said
   you could be a good person anyway.
She fed hoboes during the ‘30s,
her back porch a regular stop-over.

Every person has rights no matter
what color. Be respectful.

This son of hers, my grandfather,
still walks the streets with me.

Some twist of blood and heat still spark across the time bridge. Here, listen:

Air draws through these lungs made from his.
His blood still pulses through this hand.

Denise Low, "Walking with My Delaware Grandfather" from Mélange Block. Copyright © 2014 by Denise Low. Reprinted by permission of Denise Low.

Source: Mélange Block (Red Mountain Press, 2014)